This "Things-Liked" theory of human behavior aims to so describe the probable acts of men as to explain and predict them increasingly and thus help to augment human self-control.

The theory starts by building, thru polls of humanity, a list of human wants which posterity now seems most likely to work and live for. This listing starts, in turn, in this section by inviting every reader to rank and revise the list below so it will best express his or her own system of values.

This statement of a human value-system, or "things-liked," is intended to be highly;

- 1. Comprehensive: sampling somewhat typically all ten institutions of any culture;
- 2. Universal: satisfying all in most religions, ideologies, statuses, and periods;
- 3. Exact: specifying, in 400 words, 200 items of desiderata
- 2. Understandable: words-per-syllable ratio = 400/440 = 90% of maximum simplicity;
- 3. Important: organizing 200 most preferred items into a standardizing hierarchy.
- 4. This base-line statement of values can help test such axiological hypotheses as:
- 5. Personal Hypothesis: If each reader substitutes one's own more preferred items (keeping within 400 words) and rates them, then one can express his or her own value system.
- 6. Group Hypothesis: If groups, in controlled experiments, re-rate each item after discussion-with-intent-to agree, then closer consensus tends to result.
- 7. Human Hypothesis: If people everywhere experiment thus, persistently from childhood on up, producing more consensus on more values, then a world value-system for humanity tends to emerge, that is democratically desirable, definitive and durable.
